METH EFFECTS EVERYONE

DEA agents walked into a house in Kearns, Utah, to bust a meth lab. In addition to toxic chemicals and a drug addicted meth “cook,” they found a baby in the basement covered in lice. “Meth addicts aren’t exactly the cleanest people in the world,” they said. “But what’s sad is that they’re so concerned about getting their next ‘tweak,’ they forget about their kids.” Ambulance workers called to the scene refused to treat the child until she was “decontaminated” — washed off to remove traces of the dangerous chemicals that float in meth labs. “I had to wash her off myself before they took her to the hospital,” an agent said. “The baby was so infested with lice that the hospital advised me and everybody else that had been near her to shave our heads.”

An Arizona man high on meth hacked off his son’s head along the side of a busy freeway and then threw it out the window of his van. He pulled over his van and stabbed his son in the neck and throat approximately 60 times. He then drove off and threw the head out the window about a mile down the highway. His youngest son, who was also in the van told authorities his father had been taking methamphetamine and became enraged when he ran out of the drug. He said his father believed the devil was in the van.

An explosion caused by the vapors from the production of methamphetamine’s main ingredient ignited in an apartment, blowing out the back wall and collapsing the roof. A mortally injured man staggered outside, his skin on fire. “It was horrible,” said the manager of the apartment court, “His head was burning, his skin was burning. My husband and another tenant tried to put him out by rolling him, but he kept relighting. The flames kept coming back, like one of those trick candles.”
